There was a large attendance and many of the men present had much that was interesting to narrate concerning the old days of the work.

SIR TAGORE

(Continued from page 1.) and he, too, questioned the veracity of the Maharshi (the father). The Maharshi at once handed over a note representing a large sum of money. In a minute the station master brought the change to the train and gave it to the Maharshi. The Maharshi took the silver rupees in his hands, and unhesitatingly threw them all on the stone platform and said: 'I never tell lies for anything, much less for money.' That incident may help to explain the noble pride and peculiar fineness which characterize Rabindranath's works.

The above incident is quite in contrast to the unfortunately common custom among many of our own countrymen of making their children out to be several years younger than they really are, in order to avoid paying adult fare on street cars and railways. As the arguments over the age frequently occur in the presence and hearing of the child, he receives as sure a lesson in deceit and double-dealing as the young Rabindranath received in truthfulness; and while, in the poet's case this upright conduct on the father's part made for the nobleness and integrity of the son, just as surely does the western child have implanted in his mind through such an incident, the seeds of dishonesty and untruthfulness, which will grow and bear bitter fruit in later years.

Tagore's writings are intensely spiritual, mystical and idealistic. To his father and his father's wise handling of the spiritual side of the boy's nature, this may be ascribed. "Maharshi Debendranath Tagore was one of India's great spiritual leaders. His godliness was contagious." It is evident from the biography that Tagore was influenced in the development of his spiritual nature, not through discussions of a logical or theological nature, but through the unconscious influence of the fine, beautiful character of his father. In Edmund Gosse's book, "Father and Son," we are shown how an intensely spiritual father, through his forcing of the spiritual development of his son, alienated the boy, and disturbed the fine balance in the relationship of the two, resulting in causing a feeling of distaste rather than desire for things spiritual, in the son. In marked contrast to this is the elder Tagore's treatment of his son. When the boy rebelled at the restraint of school and the contact there with distasteful and (to him) disgusting characters, the father wisely bore the boy off with him to a retreat in the lofty Himalayas, where the boy's love and craving for the beautiful in nature was satisfied. This contact with nature at the psychological moment, when his nature was in a state of revulsion, no doubt tended to develop the lad's wonderful poetical gift and his love for God. Would that to all parents the knowledge of how to best act in crises with their children could be given! All the fortitude they possess, all the wisdom they may have acquired in their life, and all the forbearance they may have cultivated in their daily pursuits, are at times needed to meet the emergencies that arise in dealing with the young.

Wonderfully wise did the father prove himself in his handling of the boy of eleven in their mountain retreat. What Tagore says about the training he received from his far-sighted father we commend to parents and educators: "Once in a while with a stick in hand, I would rove from one mountain to another, but Father never showed the least anxiety on my account. I noticed that up to his last days he never stood in the way of my freedom. I have had occasion to do many things against his wish and liking. He could have easily punished me by way of correction, but he never did. He used to wait for the unfolding of the truth within me, for he knew that to accept truth, one must learn to love it spontaneously. He knew also that if one traveled far away from truth, still he might, one day, find his way back to it; but if external and artificial punishment compelled one to blindly follow the supposed truth, the way back to the real truth was eternally blocked. He was never afraid that I would make mistakes; he was never perturbed at the prospect of my suffering through mistakes. He used to hold up lofty ideals before me, but he never lifted the rod of chastisement."

By his lack of fear as to possible accident, by his confidence that his son would make no serious mistakes that would entail suffering, did the elder Rabindranath impress the youth with his trust in God. As parents we talk about leaving affairs in the hands of God, and about the trust we repose in Him as an omnipotent being who has us in the hollow of His hand. Strangely perplexing to his spiritual faith must this be to the child when we harass him perpetually with our fears. We cannot tell how very deeply the child's faith in God may be shaken when in one breath we declare our faith in Him and in the very next one we deny the Father our confidence.

Finally an incident which may prove of encouragement to those of us who may be passing through a period when all our efforts at training for right development may seem to have been futile. The lad returned after a year's absence in the Himalayas with his father. He was again put into school, against his own repeated remonstrances. He outwitted his guardians by promptly playing truant. At length he was taken out of school in disgust, and his eldest sister remarked in despair:

The Juniors won a basketball game yesterday. They played the Scrubs and they didn't give the poor little fellows any chance at all. When the final whistle blew the score stood 60 to 13. Looks very much a bowling score, doesn't it? To see it was more like a game of mumble peg.

The most important remaining basketball match will be between the Juniors and Sophs. Both teams claim an easy victory in the fight for second honors. The school coach, as might be expected, is keeping his eye on the players for material with which to make a school team.

Tomorrow will be Benson day at the school. An assembly on the sixth period which comes immediately afternoon will be turned over to the Socialist club. Everyone is invited in the following communication from the head of the organization:

The Socialist organization through great good fortune has secured Walter Thomas Yarrow to deliver an address on Socialism before the Student body, Wednesday, November 1, at 12:45 o'clock. By profession Mr. Yarrow is a geologist and chemist, being a graduate of both Oxford and Cambridge. He has traveled throughout the world and is an exceedingly keen student of economics and political science. He has paid special attention to the study of working class questions in Europe, and an address which is worth the while of every broad minded citizen of our community is promised. The public is cordially invited. Remember the time.

The G. O. P. will have its turn on next Friday. Leaders declare that the Republican parade will far outdo the recent demonstration for President Wilson.

The American History classes report on current events Monday's. Mr. Howe, who is a Hughes booster, listened to some very encouraging reports yesterday, and to some which were not.

Students who want to win the Stylus joke prize this year will do well to get notebooks and catch the good ones that are put over in class. That is the only way to get jokes that really have a laugh, and unless they are noted at once they are soon forgotten.

"We all expected that Rabi would make a mark in the world; but all our hopes have been nipped in the bud by the waywardness of this boy—and now he will be the only unsuccessful man in the family." This of the man whose fame for his poetry, his fine manhood and the good he has done the youths of his land—through the system of education which he promulgated there has gone round the world! At best, parents can only strive for high ideals, and leave the rest to God, confident, like Rabindranath Tagore's father, that, having done our part, we need not fear.
